The new edition of this core text for rural sociology courses includes major conceptual and topical developments of the past several years, presenting a practical framework for students to understand the internal and external forces shaping rural communities today. Focusing on various capitals in rural areas—natural, cultural, human, social, political, financial, and built—the book uses an integrative approach based on the concepts and explanations of social science. Important features include:

- An entirely new chapter on governance;
- Updated discussions of the impact on rural communities of international immigration, the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and hurricanes Katrina and Rita;
- Thorough coverage of issues such as racial and cultural diversity, globalization, organizing a sustainable future, and building community in the context of ubiquitous change;
- Chapter-opening vignettes with real people and events, which illustrate the application of important concepts.
