“A must-read for anyone concerned with the devastating effects Katrina had on Louisiana and the nation, and a worthy anchor text for courses on environmental justice, social inequality, and the American future.”

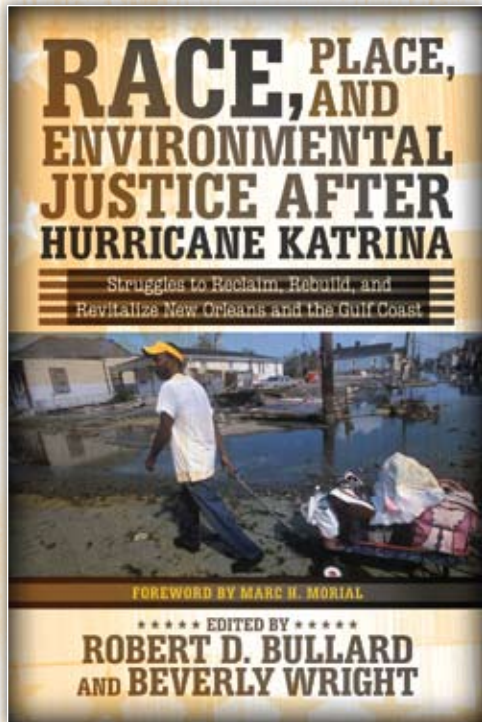

—Manuel Pastor, University of Southern California

Race, Place, and Environmental Justice After Hurricane Katrina exposes the racial disparities that exist in disaster response and recovery and challenges the geography of vulnerability. This bold new book

- ★ Examines the disaster through the lens of environmental justice and human rights and is not afraid to ask the critical questions: Does race matter? Why do some communities get left behind economically and physically before and after a disaster?
- ★ Provides essential suggestions for how to more effectively handle future disasters and details the steps we can still take to improve the post-Katrina rebuilding process.
- ★ Brings together contributions from top scholars writing specifically for this book, including a foreword by Marc H. Morial.
