"This indispensable text provides a complex and nuanced argument that is highly readable. This text should be required reading for scholars in the field, while Ehrlich's case studies of the media make the text appealing and accessible to students at all levels."

—Abby Ferber, University of Colorado, Colorado Springs

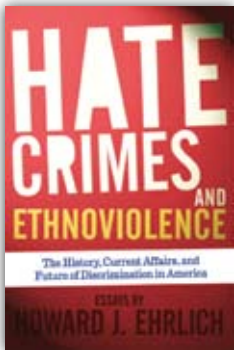

In this illuminating and empirically grounded collection of essays, noted scholar and activist Howard J. Ehrlich chronicles his unparalleled experience with ethnoviolence and hate crimes research. This important new text

- Introduces the ten dimensions of American's social heritage that are necessary for a complete understanding of prejudice.
- Explains the differences between ethnoviolence and hate crimes, with special emphasis on prevalence, perpetrators, and effects.
- Provides in-depth data and analysis of how the mainstream news media maintains racial and ethnic stereotypes.
- Utilizes case studies of watershed moments in recent American history to examine the effect of such events on intergroup relations.
